Over the weekend, throngs of San Francisco foodies looking for a good time, endless food tastings and the chance to sample as much wine and liquor as they could handle, gathered at Fort Mason for Eat Drink SF. A self-proclaimed "culinary affair," the format is pretty simple: Chefs and purveyors prepare a signature bite and the booze-fueled crowd happily queues for items like maple bacon atop a chocolate truffle, caramelized short ribs with mashed purple potato, or butterscotch pudding with whipped cream.

A favorite bite was The Cavalier's cold-smoked pork loin, although the stuffed fox that accompanied it wasn't a dish but a nod to the restaurant's English hunting theme. (Poor old fox. Maybe the management doesn't realize that fox hunting is now illegal in the U.K.)
